

Vision, Mission, and Objectives of the Department of Conservation of Antiquities and Manuscripts According to the Bologna Process for the Academic Year 2025-2026

Vision:

Department of Conservation of Antiquities and Manuscripts is the academic body that, through its cultural studies, recognizes that ancient Iraqi civilization in particular, and ancient Near Eastern civilizations in general, contributed significantly to human civilization by providing all the elements of development and the foundations for scientific, intellectual, and cognitive advancement. This civilization served as the crucible in which all the cultural elements contributed by its people throughout their successive history were forged. Through concerted efforts, exemplified by the establishment of College of Archaeology in general and Department of Civilization in particular, the department, with its specialized studies and college, has dedicated itself to focusing its efforts on this civilization, aiming to introduce it to all segments of the population and to promote its cultural heritage.

Preserving this heritage is a vital national duty, and the department works and collaborates with other departments within the college to achieve this, recognizing it as one of its primary objectives. The country's cultural heritage belongs to its people and future generations, and therefore, a historical responsibility rests on everyone to exert efforts focused on a future vision to achieve the desired aspirations and goals.

Mission:

To highlight the civilizational role of Iraq and the ancient Near East in the course of humanity, and the great achievements of ancient Iraqi civilization in all fields, as one of the first and oldest authentic ancient civilizations, whose roots extend deep into prehistory, which formed the beginnings of many important civilizational manifestations. The focus on civilizational studies of Iraq and the ancient Near East has been a primary priority for the Department of Civilization, aiming to elevate this role, with all its components and civilizational elements, to the level of global recognition among ancient human civilizations, as a crucible of scientific, intellectual, and cognitive contributions, and to introduce future generations to the enrichment this role has provided to all of humanity throughout its long history.

Objectives:

- * To support and enhance the scientific objectives of the College of Archaeology.
- * To achieve communication and integration with all departments of the College of Archaeology.
- * To contribute through civilizational studies and research to spreading civilizational awareness among members of society and introducing them to the country's civilization and its historical and cultural depth.
- * To graduate specialized personnel to support the state sectors and departments in service to the country. • Establishing postgraduate studies within the department to enhance its academic standing, specializations, and college, and to empower both staff and students to assume their academic roles as a newly established department.

- * Enhancing the department's academic level by developing and updating curricula and academic specializations to align with scientific advancements and the college's aspirations and objectives. This includes developing the academic capabilities of faculty members through participation and contribution to various scientific activities and events.

- * Expanding cultural, humanitarian, and social activities, and collaborating with various state institutions to activate the university's role, through its educational institutions in colleges and departments, in serving the community and addressing humanitarian needs, in addition to fostering cultural and scientific cooperation.

- * Activating the role of blended e-learning and encouraging students and college to continue its use. This will contribute to moving university education to a more open stage and facilitate cooperation with educational, cultural, and humanitarian institutions worldwide, not just within the university and Iraq. • Motivating college members to publish in reputable international journals in a way that serves the scientific principles established by University of Mosul to improve the university's status and standing among Iraqi universities and other international universities.
