The Department of International Relations at the College of Political Science, University of Mosul, holds a seminar discussing the path of development in Iraqi political orientations.

The Department of International Relations at the College of Political Science, University of Mosul, held its scientific seminar entitled: “The Path of Development in Iraqi Political Orientations: A Vision on Regional and International Dimensions,” on Thursday, October 10, 2024.

The seminar discussed the Iraqi strategic vision for the path of development in light of international and regional changes, the position of the development path within the map of regional and international relations, as well as the role of international economic organizations in supporting the development project, alongside the security challenges faced and the available economic opportunities.

The seminar aimed to highlight the importance of the development path for Iraq, its strategic dimensions, and the necessity of providing Iraqi decision-makers with political, economic, and social studies that reveal strengths and weaknesses, while also addressing the opportunities and challenges that must be identified.

It concluded that Iraq needs a strategic vision for the development project that clarifies the economic feasibility of pursuing this path and aims to enable Iraq to play an active and influential role. This can be achieved by leveraging the historical depth of Iraqi-Turkish friendship, intensifying cooperation with global financial and economic institutions to secure funding for development projects, signing Iraqi-regional partnership agreements, and investing Iraq's strategic location to enhance political influence and support stability.

The seminar was held under the patronage and attendance of the Dean of the College, Assistant Professor Dr. Tareq Muhammad Tayyib Dhahir, in cooperation with the Continuing Education Unit. It included ten research papers presented by the department's faculty members.
